INNOVATION UPDATE FROM ISRAEL IDEAS Israeli Tech To Help Solve California Water Problems

In the US, cleantech has often focused on ways to develop alternative energies, like solar and wind, but it's becoming increasingly clear that water may be an even bigger problem.

"Just look at what happened in Flint," said Mark Donig, a member of the steering committee of the Israel-California Green-Tech Partnership. "The lead in the water there is due to a longstanding infrastructure problem that is going to take years and billions of dollars to fix, and it's a problem that is likely to repeat itself in many other places.

"As a developer of inexpensive and relatively inexpensive water technologies, Israel is a place the U.S. must look to in order to ensure that farmers, industry, and citizens have access to clean, potable water." That's not just Donig's opinion. On World Water Day – the White House announced a series of projects and programs designed to "elevate a national dialogue on the state of our Nation's water resources and infrastructure," with support, investments, and resources provided for technologies that can improve water management, promote conservation, and "advance water sustainability on all fronts."
